Chapter 4: A Structure Of The Mind. Many different personality theories have been advanced in an attempt to explain the structure and functioning of human personality and behavior. A fairly simplistic one, which I have found useful when explaining a variety of concepts to my clients, involves three concentric layers of personality (ADD DIAGRAM 1).

Jaworski claims that HM solves the hard problem and the mind-body problem assuming the ontological primacy of structure. Nonetheless, HM's anti-reductivism clashes with Jaworski's take on the distinction between the mental and the physical: [HM] does not treat the mental-physical distinction as canonical, but simply as an artefact of our ...

The Id, Ego, Superego structure of mind complements Freud's structural or topographical ("iceberg") model of the unconscious, pre-conscious, & conscious (see below). Note that the Ego and Superego play roles in each of the three levels of consciousness, but the Id is entirely played out in the Unconscious.

One way to look at the brain's structure is based on the theory of evolution. Only 100,000 years ago, the ancestors of modern man had a brain weighing only about a pound, which is roughly a third of the weight of our current brain. Most of this increased weight is because of a much larger cerebral cortex.

In my previous post I wrote about values as being transitions from one phase of life into another, that I placed in a model of development. In this post I want to write a little more about the model of mind and matter where the model of development is based upon. How the four elements relate to each other. Where they are similar and where they differ.
